But in two shockingly similar cases of misfortune, it quickly turned into an evening of double Dutch despair. First it was Sifan Hassan, at the beginning of her quest to claim an extraordinary distance treble at these Championships, who took a tumble. She tripped as she battled Ethiopia 's Gudaf Tsegay down the home straight in the women's 10,000metres and finished without a medal. Then in the mixed 4x400m relays, the very next race, compatriot Femke Bol was left face down on the track at the National Athletics Centre. Matching American Alexis Holmes stride-for-stride in a scuffle for gold, the 23-year-old suffered a heavy fall just meters from the line. Netherlands 4x400m mixed relay team was disqualified after Bol dropped the baton during her fall in the closing stages of the race The 23-year-old has successfully navigated the preliminary rounds of the 400m hurdles Bol was denied gold at last summer's championships by Olympic champion and world record holder in the 400m hurdles Sydney McLaughlin-Levrone, but she is absent through injury There was no trip this time around. Simply the pain that came from the accumulation of lactic acid in her legs as she charged towards the line caused them to give way. Bol hit her head and dropped her team's baton, meaning the Dutch quartet were disqualified. Watching on in disbelief Britain's former heptathlon world champion summed it up perfectly. 'You just couldn't write it, could you?' On Thursday night Bol has a chance to right the wrongs of Saturday when she goes off in the women's 400m hurdles final. She is the second-fastest woman of all time in the event and heading into these Championships none of her competitors had came even close to matching her season-best time of 51.45. At last summer's Championships in Oregon she could only claim silver in the discipline. If she is able to shake the demons of Saturday's run, then she is almost certain to get her hands on the Worlds gold that has been missing from her collection. "content": "Writing in his denied the going around about possibly being back in for Guehi to replace Gabriel Magalhaes, stating that the Gunners had an interest in him before they chose to move for Timber instead. At that time, it seems Arsenal also considered Mohamed Simakan from RB Leipzig, and Aymeric Laporte, who is now moving from Manchester City to Al Nassr. Guehi, Simakan or Laporte could surely have been very decent signings for Arsenal, but fans probably shouldn't get their hopes up over any of them joining this late on in the window. Timber's injury is a major blow, but it seems that Romano remains convinced that Gabriel will be staying at the Emirates Stadium, at least. "To clarify again, Arsenal are not letting Gabriel Magalhaes leave, he's staying and he's key player for Arsenal - the position looks very clear despite some speculation that they could allow a sale if they bring in Marc Guehi as a replacement," Romano said. "Guehi was one of the players considered by Arsenal back in May alongside Mohamed Simakan and Aymeric Laporte but then they decided to go for Jurrien Timber in very clear way. "As I previously said, Arsenal will explore the market for cover for Timber, but at the moment there's no change, nothing concrete or imminent."",

The new 12-track project is set to arrive on November 03 via Solid State Records. That date is a unique one for the band, as it will mark a year exactly since they suffered a horrific van accident, in which their vehicle suddenly flipped on some black ice whilst they were driving through Wyoming. The crash caused some subsequent struggles with hearing loss for singer Garrett Russell, though eventually led him to have a newfound connection with music and the Silent Planet project. Have a listen to the project's new single 'Collider' below. The new track carries a heavy emotional message, with Russell explaining: 'Collider' follows the release of previous tune 'Antimatter', which arrived last month and will also feature on the forthcoming LP.     "content": "The smartphone is available for under $340 / £300 making it one of the most affordable phones we've reviewed so far, but does it do enough to make it into the list of the ? Find out in our full review... The Samsung Galaxy A53 5G may be last year's mid-range model, but now it's pricing makes it a strong contender in the budget phone space. It even offers a quad camera setup, with 4 cameras on the back, but don't get too excited, as one of these is for depth information, and another is a 5MP macro camera. The main camera gives us a , with PDAF and OIS (optical image stabilisation), and this uses , giving you 16MP images. The is a , which is nice to see on a budget phone, as some others will save money here with an 8MP camera. The third camera is a , and there's also a 5MP depth camera. There's a , with fixed focus, an f/2.2 aperture, and this uses pixel binning to give you 12MP or 8MP images (depending on the framing). Video recording is up to 4K resolution and 30fps, from the rear and selfie camera. Depending which camera you use will affect whether you get autofocus, and for this you'll need to use the main camera on the back. You also benefit from optical image stabilisation when using the main camera. The camera app gives quick access to the usual photo modes, which includes a portrait mode (with multiple options), a fun mode (with Snapchat filters built-in), the video mode, and under "More" there are a range of additional shooting modes, including a Pro mode, and a Pro video mode. On screen options in the photo mode include the ultra-wide-angle camera, the main 1x camera, and a quick shortcut to 2x digital zoom. There's a pro mode that lets you change manual settings, and this can also be a handy way of measuring white balance for a scene. The phone, like other Samsung smartphones, gives quick access to the camera app, as you can simply double-press the power button. There's a 6.5inch screen, with an under-screen fingerprint reader. The screen looks good with good colour. There's a small circular cut out at the top for the selfie camera. Stereo speakers are nice to see on an affordable phone, and memory can be expanded with a MicroSD card. There's also an IP67 rating, giving water resistance up to 1m for 30 minutes. The rear of the phone is made of plastic, compared to a glass back on the A54. The sides are made of plastic, which is the same as the A54. The battery is rated at 5000mAh which gives plenty of life for a day+ worth of life. Charging is rated at 25W, but unfortunately the phone does not feature wireless charging. In the box you'll find a USB cable, a sim eject tool, but no charger. Colour options are worth mentioning as you'll find the phone is available in black, white, blue or peach, as seen here. Images from the Samsung Galaxy A53 are good straight out of the camera, and you can rely on the camera's reliable focus and exposure. You don't need to worry about changing the exposure, unless you wanted to adjust to your own personal tastes. Dynamic range is also good most of the time, with automatic HDR (high-dynamic range) helping. In comparison to other smartphones, colours can seem a little too saturated, and there's a slight improvement in this with the newer A54. Purple fringing was noticeable, particularly when using the ultra-wide-angle camera, and taking photos of trees for example. Flare was well controlled, even with the sun in the frame. When it was out of frame, it was noticeable on videos recorded with the phone. There's a dedicated "Macro" option using the 5MP camera, however, you get significantly better photos from the main camera. See the close-up photo of the green chilli's taken with the main camera, above, and then compare them to the macro image taken with the 5MP macro camera below, which really can't cope with indoor lighting. Whilst you can get much closer to your subject with the macro camera, you will need to make sure that lighting is very good, otherwise images will lack detail and colour. The night mode does a reasonable job, in low-light conditions, letting you take photos without the need for a or other support. Results from the A53 don't quite match the level of the A54, however. Using the selfie camera, you get the option of a wide view, which gives you 12MP images, or a closer view, which gives you 8MP images. The camera has struggled a little bit with the dynamic range in the selfie taken in the sun, and the high levels of saturation haven't helped here. In low light conditions, the selfie camera struggles a bit, but results are reasonable. Video stabilisation is reasonable, with the camera recording relatively stable footage when using the phone handheld. 4K video can be recorded using the main rear cameras, or the selfie camera. Flare can be an issue. At this price point, there are a number of alternatives, with the being around the same price, as well as the , which has seen lower prices since the Nothing Phone 2 has been released. If you did want to consider the , you'd be looking at a noticeable price bump. For more options have a look at our guide to the . The Samsung Galaxy A53 5G, now that it's been out for more than a year, offers incredible value for money for people on a tighter budget. In fact, there's not a lot of difference between this phone, and the newer, more expensive A54, apart from a few minor differences. There is an improvement in camera performance with the newer model, but if your budget is tight, then it might be out of the question. Whether you prefer the glass back of the A54 or the curved camera island on the back of the A53 is probably down to personal preference. But if you're looking to save yourself some money, then the A53 is a good choice. We'd also be very tempted to consider the as an alternative, as this is a similar price and offers a great dual camera setup.",

Many fans expect Zack Snyder's return to the mainstream after transforming his DC Extended Universe, making Rebel Moon one of the year's most-awaited films. Finally, there is a trailer for the movie that is appealing and engaging. The lengthy trailer introduces all critical parts and provides a look into Snyder's colorful and terrifying universe created for the film. Although referred to as a teaser, the movie's trailer is three minutes long and thoroughly introduces Snyder's sci-fi universe, complete with mythology. The story unfolds in a peaceful colony under attack from the oppressive Mother World and the Imperium's army, headed by Regent Balisarius. Kora, a former Imperium member, becomes the colony's greatest hope for survival and gathers a small band of warriors throughout the galaxy to fight the Mother World. Rebel Moon, which depicts the story of an uprising against an oppressive empire, had been initially planned by Snyder as a Star Wars film, as seen by its premise and trailer. The trailer contains nearly every element of sci-fi imagery popularised by the Star Wars franchise in three minutes of the film, including trademark spacecraft, a broad assortment of planets, alien races, strange creatures, and talking robots. The trailer opens with Anthony Hopkins' robot character, Jimmy, an old mechanical knight who tells the story of a princess prophesied to stop the war. Bae Doona's Nemesis, a robot swordmaster hired by Kora, uses a weapon that resembles a lightsaber, implying that Snyder's galactic opera may be a little too Star Wars-inspired. Kora has also enlisted former Imperium General Titus, rogue starship pilot Kai, a farmer Gunnar, and a blacksmith with the power to interact with animals named Tarak as allies in her struggle against the Mother World. Darrian Bloodaxe, Millius, and the deadly spider Harmada round out the fighters. Regent Balisarius and Admiral Atticus Noble are the bad guys on the Rebel Moon. Snyder aims to convert Rebel Moon into a Star Wars-style series for , with a diverse cast of heroes, villains, and worlds. Rebel Moon will be available on Netflix on December 22, 2023. The series's sequel is Rebel Moon: Part Two – The Scargiver, although no release date has been set. It was initially meant to be a Netflix original series, but plans changed later.",

  "content": "Paul and Karen Smith's son Harry took his life on A-Level results day and after a decade the couple are undertaking a fundraiser challenge in his memory A couple who have embarked on a 580-mile bike ride in memory of their son have gone viral on TikTok, after their daughter chose to share their story. Paul and Karen Smith are taking part in their self-titled to raise money for suicide prevention charity to mark the 10-year anniversary of their son, Harry's death. The pair have described the reaction on social media as "unbelievable" after the surpassed 2 million views and has seen flooding in from all over the world. Karen Smith said: "It's an added dimension to what was an incredibly emotional experience. Advertisement Advertisement "We feel quite overwhelmed but in a positive way and getting all these donations from literally all different parts of the world." The couple are days into their cycle challenge around England and Wales, which has started at Harry's school, with a send off from Brian Blessed OBE, and will end on September 2. Mr and Mrs Smith have wanted to share the importance of talking to children about exam results after losing their son Harry in 2013. The family were on holiday in France when his A-Level exam results came through. Unfortunately, Harry's grades were not what he expected and he left for a walk to collect his thoughts, before the family grew concerned that he had not returned home. Harry took his life at 17 years old, with his mum Karen saying: "Harry was such an exceptional child and he filled the room, very popular, bright, had adhd, impulsive and did a very stupid thing as a one-off that totally totally flummoxed us." Harry's dad, Paul, added: "After we lost him we met up with quite a few of his friends and they all collectively said that if they would have to pick someone who would have done something like that, Harry would have been at the bottom of the list and that's why it came as such a shock. were very hard. You know, within the first year we were barely functioning and we speak for a lot of parents in a similar position. We met so many over the years who just go through it some never get over the loss of a child through suicide. "So the passage of time makes a lot of people stronger but it's not that's not the case for everyone. But you know we're in our position to do something so that's what we're doing now." Karen also shared the "ripple effect" of suicide, saying "if you're young and you do it, it impacts on your siblings and your parents and the grandparents. If you're older it impacts on your family." Karen and Paul Smith are now urging parents to talk to their children about suicide, especially around exam season, when many young people may feel upset about their results. Karen said: "It's such a taboo subject" before Paul added: "It still carries a stigma and is probably one of the most uncomfortable subjects between that and death, that people can talk about. Advertisement Advertisement "But so many people who lost kids to suicide will never know why and that's the hardest thing to live with. If we can get people to actually sit down and talk to the kids and pay attention to not only what they're saying but what they're not saying in a lot of cases." Karen said that exam season has given the couple an "amazing opportunity" to share their story and raise funds for Papyrus. She added: "We lost Harry on exam day and exams for me the last 10 years have been the most difficult time." Papyrus, the suicide prevention charity which has been chosen by the couple as their fundraising target, have shared . The charity runs a 24/7 Hopeline on 0800 068 4141, text 07860 039967 or email for any students or parents who may be struggling with the results. Paul said: "My favourite quote from one of Harry's old headmasters; he said that everyone's good at something. I can remember him saying it and I thought 'yeah he's got a point there', so kids who aren't academically gifted will be good at something else, and that's what's got to be nurtured and developed." Advertisement Advertisement Karen added: "We've had so many of our comments within the donation saying either my child is really stressed and worried about it and i'm going to approach it differently and I'm going to talk through or they've seen particularly the youngsters, rather than our and ." The couple are rapidly approaching their £60,000 target which has been raised over the last couple of days, after growing support for their challenge. Paul said: "If we can exceed that target we'll be just over the moon. It's gone beyond our wildest dreams already." Paul and Karen Smith have already raised eight thousand pounds for charity Suicide and Co after hosting a quiz with Shaun Wallace, who is The Dark Destroyer from ITV's The Chase.
